The most popular drink in Britain is tea: 182 million cups are consumed each day by 77 per cent of the British population. It became popular in the 18th century, when it was imported from China and India.

The British are famous for drinking tea at all times of the day. Whenever people have a few moments to relax during the day, they have a cup of tea. Most English people drink tea with sugar and a lot of milk.

“Tea” may be just a cup of tea that you take quickly during a break, or a social occasion when tea and a variety of biscuits are served. Chatting goes along with sipping the drink. This tradition is slowly disappearing as people are busier than in the past; it is however quite popular with elderly people.
